THE RISE(RADIO) AND THE FALL(TV) IN THE IMPORTANCE OF COMPOSERS!

By HARRY SOSNIK

(Former Music Veep At Ted Bates Agency And, ABC-TV Network)

Beginning in the 1920s radio broadcasting, as a then-new entertainment medium, was both dependent upon and a great contributor to 'pop' as well as classical music. Literally hundreds of dance bands from coast to coast became "names" from the "air" exposure. Conductors became celebrities because of easy recognizable "styles" in sound or verbal personalities, per Ben Bernie and Phil Harris or in the case of singers Rudy Vallee and Bing Crosby.

Both the original radio networks and the hundreds of local radio stations used pop orchestras and classical groups by remote-pickups from ballroom, hotel or nightclub locations as the basis of all programming. Studio origins, at first, were practically non-existent.

An exchange-barter system was used whereby the stations and networks would be furnished with "free" music in exchange for exploiting the artists and the various places of entertainment on the air. As radio progressed and developed beyond its primitive and/or novelty stage to a point where its commercial value became recognized, the use of music became even more important. Studio orchestras were added to the ongoing remote pickups. Soon advertising agencies moved their clients into this new means of selling their products directly to millions of homes.

The Big Change

The purpose of my present remarks is to describe and emphasize the increasing value of music and musicians, as radio expanded, against the contrasting disadvantages to music and musicians when video replaced radio as the dominant mass broadcasting medium. With radio "You Closed Your Eyes and Imagined" but with video "You Opened Your Eyes And Saw" — no close concentration or imagination was necessary.

Radio drama and comedy were completely dependent on music (and sound effects) to establish the moods with music scores, themes and narrative bridges to set up and advance and carry the story along. Television, the pictorial medium, diminished this participation to a great degree and even when using music the impact was not as great as with one-dimensional radio.

Happy Bygones

My own career as a conductor-composer-arranger spanning the period from the dance bands to the many important radio and television programs, as musical director, as well as having been the musical director of the Decca Record Co. and later v.p. in charge of music for the Ted Bates Advertising Agency and more recently v.p. in charge of music for 10 years of the American Broadcasting Co. has given me a very broad perspective on the reasons for the decline in importance of music in tv.

If the technological advance in communications signifies "progress" it did not or does not necessarily apply to the area of music per se. Instead a retrogression and diminution in the media masters' conception of the importance of music in the visual medium became all too obvious.

Let's examine the role of music during the peak years of radio. In radio the producers, script writers and even members of the cast established a very close collaboration with the composer — the program was a tightly knit entity. Without the music to motivate the story by activating the imagination of the listener there would have been dullness. Contrariwise, there is nowadays, no such importance accorded music in the creation of a television program.

Technology's Shadow

The first small step in the decline, although it was not clear at the time, as regards the importance of music was the introduction of "progress" when Bing Crosby and the Kraft Company decided to pre-record the Thursday Kraft broadcast and play the transcription on the air instead of doing the show "live" as was customary.

Would the public accept a recorded program?

Would the public know the difference?

Would the public care?

The public did not know or care and so pre-recording was born.

It was the beginning of the inroads of further technology although live music was still being used in radio.

TV And Its Many Crafts

A new set of values was created and a reassessment of priorities took place. This new medium (color and video tape had not been perfected as yet) called for camera crews, stagehands, scenic designers, hair dressers, carpenters, costume designers, and makeup artists in addition to the handful of people it took to do a radio program. With television there were also the costs of building scenery, trucking, storage and the conversion of many old movie houses and theatres into television studios. All of these facilities could only be provided by the networks — the agencies were service companies.

The networks became the producers and the power. The realities of the economics made it inevitable that there would be studies to determine where there could be savings. It was inevitable that the new values dictated that now a stagehand or camera man was more important, indispensable if you will, than a musician or the size of the orchestra. Music became "expendable."

However, this change was gradual. Tv was still "live" — tape had not been perfected. Music budgets were being cut — not always to save money — but sometimes to use the money in other areas. The big crunch was to come with perfection of color and video-tape.

Stress 'Merchandizing'

With these two new ingredients and an ever increasing audience created by the use of stars — Milton Berle and Jack Benny — tv became the most powerful medium of communication in the history of the world. It also changed from an "entertainment" medium to a "merchandising" medium replacing much of the newspaper and magazine advertising. Many newspapers and magazines were put out of business.

In every negotiation between the producers and the American Federation of Musicians music gradually lost ground and it became a fight for survival of the music profession. With the advent of 'location' shooting both in the U.S. and abroad plus the new deals with the AFM permitting the re-use of a certain percentage of recorded music, the use of music became more and more minimal and of course the "runaway" production overseas used foreign music which was cheaper. The importance of the use of music had come way down in the scale of necessity and finally today is one of the last areas to be decided upon or against in television production.

The wonderful age of technology with all of its progress in communications and improvements in the recording of sound has practically "improved" music as once known in radio out of the pic-
